I don't know if this is common knowledge or not
--and most of us act like we would never be a good fit in It-- but the facts are crystal clear.

BioDiversity and Sustainable Ecosystems stabilize the *Whole Thing--*and are therefore to be Revered.

Why believe, or even think of, something as Sacred?

It's Natural. There are Truths which Brighten the souls and bodies of human beings, and those Truths become Sacred. It's most Natural.

We may then agree with the Vedic affirmation: “The person who shines in the Sun--that one I am”
[from “Mantra and Meditation” by Pandi Usharbudh Arya (p. 57)]; which is, in many ways true, in any language--an intuitive insight into the actual biophysics of the Mystery of Light and Love.
We are Native to the Sun and the Earth--“All My Relatives”.

We may attain the Bright Part, I am sure, either through much difficulty, or by way of the many intuitive understandings of how Love works. Naturally, we have Traditions, by which we have guidance for the journey--Sacred Vows, Ceremonial Entrances, Cultural Keys, Storytelling and Remembering, the everyday circumstances of The Good Life, etc. Not so much tribal, as Natural.
We honor our Sacred Ancestors.

Any such Lineage can lead to the Brightness, and Divine Life.

Parts of It may appear in the most humble of circumstances, Naturally, at any time.

There are people who keep track of how the Brightness stays lit. They are also to be Revered.

And so on, with “All My Relatives”--All to be Revered.

There may be many of Our Relatives which we would not like to see in our humble abode, or over there.

A fair understanding of sharing and tolerance in Worldly Phenomena is always a good place to start.

The Wise need less and less of Worldly Phenomena, and They Shine Their Messages.

The Good Life is very small, and yet It is in such Communion with the Natural Potential in All Things that It Shines.

The Good Life is a Natural Phenomena which can be replicated.

However, since It is an Organic Process, there will never be a machine which can attain It, or replicate It.
